Re: Ambassador Robert Tuttle Named Board Co-chair of the Pacific Council

Dear Members:

As members of the Pacific Council, you understand the critical role that our Board of Directors plays in leading and strengthening our organization. I write to update you on some key developments from our Board of Directors Winter meeting that convened on Friday, February 26, 2010 in Los Angeles.

I am very pleased to announce that the first official act of our Board at the meeting was to elect former United States Ambassador to the United Kingdom Robert Tuttle to serve as Co-Chair of the Pacific Council alongside Co-Chair John Bryson. We are immensely pleased that Bob has agreed to serve in this role, and we are confident that he will help to lead the Pacific Council to the next level of achievement and impact. Bob comes to the Pacific Council after 4 years as President George W. Bush's representative to the Court of St. James, where his record of accomplishment was by all accounts a great success. Through his co-leadership of the Council's Board, I expect that Bob's energy and enthusiasm will further energize Pacific Council efforts to think and act globally as outlined in our strategic plan. We are especially pleased at the diversity of expertise, skill, and experience he brings to our organization and we are honored to welcome such a recognized and respected member of the foreign policy community to our Board.

Bob will replace the Council's longstanding Co-Chair, Warren Christopher, who after six years in that role announced his intention to step down. We will miss Chris's leadership as Co-chair but are delighted at his continued service on our Board as Chairman Emeritus. Chris's impact on the Pacific Council has set an extraordinary standard for us all. His selfless commitment to the Council has been transformational for our organization as has his wisdom, judgment, and insight into international affairs. We are deeply grateful to Chris for his leadership as well as for his commitment to moving the Council to a new level.

With warm regards,
